

RECAP

The idea of progress as far as family is concerned is inevitably connected to the evolution of modern society. Strict traditional education used to be quite common with a large families who passed on strongly conservative moral values to their children.

Over the last century, male-dominated societies have been challenged and women have become emancipated, financially and sexually. As a consequence, values have been redefined and new family structures have emerged: single parenthood, recognition of same-sex parents, remarriage and blended families.

But resistance and counter-movements have also developed: they criticize the changes in family profiles that they consider an illusion of progress an advocate a society founded on traditional family units for religious and politically conservative reasons. They argue that these changes have affected the emotional stability of children and their education, and might be dangerous for society.

However it can't be denied that with the emergence of new family profiles, American society in particular and western societies in general, appear to be more diverse and tolerant.
